REVIEW

HARD TO FIND

"Good Man" consists of abrasive interaction between women who are awkward and irritable and men who are, for the most part, hedonistic and brainless.

Too often, "A Good Man" approaches issues such as domestic violence in a shallow, unsatisfactory manner. For example, in the play's first scene a group of women discuss the issue with such flip, one-dimensional comments that the result is an appalling insult not only to black women in particular but to all women in general.

Too often, characters resolve a situation by slapping each other. This is not uplifting.

The play has many funny moments, but toward the end the humor becomes just plain grating and most of the characters are just too flat and stylized to get any understanding of how they think and feel. It's a waste of the extraordinary acting talent of some of the company, especially lead characters Sibyl Turman and Dean Harper.

The performance, which is sold out, will be repeated today at 3 and 7:30 p.m.
